The silicon-based materials are well-known in the art as either amorphous or polycrystalline materials. In semiconductor applications such as thin film transistors (TFTs), amorphous silicon has been the material of choice in the TFT industry, because the amorphous silicon materials can be formed with a lower temperature process and are thus less expensive than polycrystalline silicon or other higher temperature silicon-based materials. However, because of its fabrication limitations and cost, amorphous silicon is being replaced with the more conductive polycrystalline silicon as the active channel material in TFT devices.
