A: You can't use the PDF

reader on Linux because it stores the PDF as a file on disk and Linux doesn't have installed software to read those files. You'd need to extract the PDF into memory and then use the reader. So this means that you're limited to find it online, and you'll need to do that first: Print it Take a picture of it Or print it and bring it to your local library Put in in a library catalog and find it on-line if your library has it in digital format Or, if you're lucky enough to live in or near a city with a library with a lot of resources, you could use a scanning service. Though please note that: The quality of the scanned PDF may vary depending on the document itself and the scanning service used. The scanned PDF will be a copy of the original, and thus requires ownership of the original document (which you may not want to hand out). I understand that's not what you're asking about, but I can't help myself. The path to the PDF file You'll need to start by finding the path to the PDF file. To do that, enter file in the terminal. This will open an interactive shell: $ file file.pdf file.pdf: HTML document, UTF-8 Unicode text, with very long lines This means that the file is written in a format that is compatible with webpages, which in this case is HTML. So you can't just browse to it directly as a web page. So the next step is to convert the PDF to a sort of HTMLish format that can be read by your web browser. This is most easily done using a PDF reader. I
